Cc

C

C, c /siː/.
The third letter of the modern English alphabet and of the ancient Roman one, orig. corresp. to Greek gamma, Semitic gimel. In early Latin the letter represented both the voiced /g/ and voiceless /k/ velar plosive consonants; subsequently it stood only for the latter. When the Roman alphabet was introduced into Britain, C had only the /k/ sound, and this remains the case in the Celtic langs. As a result of developments both in Britain and in Continental Europe in the Old English and Middle English periods, C in mod. English has a number of values according to the following general rules. (i) C has the 'hard' sound /k/ before a, o, u, before a consonant exc. h, and when final. Final c is largely avoided exc. in mod. words adopted from or modelled on Latin or Greek (disc, sac, italic), the /k/ sound being usu. expressed by k or ck. When hard c is followed in inflection by e or i, it is usu. changed to ck (frolicking, picnicker). (ii) C has the 'soft' sound /s/ before e, i, y. Where the /s/ sound is final, it is written ce, and this e is retained in composition before a, o, u. (iii) ci (rarely ce) preceding another vowel has freq. the sound /ʃ/, esp. in the endings -cious, -cial, -cion (cf. T, t). (iv) ch is in effect a separate consonant: see before the beginning of the ch- words. (v) In adoptions from other langs. C may retain the foreign pronunciation (ceilidh, cello). Pl. cees, C's, Cs.

▸I 1 The letter and its sound.
2 The shape of the letter.
C-shaped adjective having a shape or cross-section like the letter C. C-spring a C-shaped spring, used to support the body of a carriage.
